BY J. R. S. The tall house lowers grimly

Deformed by smoke and rain : And the bleared sunshine d imig Blinks on the window pane,

Though sore and numb her fingers, And slowly fastes the light, The girl nor rests nor lingers, But sows from morn till night.

Her bright young face is sunken,

And falls her gentle breath; Her fair young form is shrunken,

And I think of the woodland shadows That she has never seen : Of the wonder of song in the meadows

When all the world is green. But now the close lips quiver, The nimble hands are slow,—

The voice she dreams of ever Rings out in the room below. The mad young poet is singing. With only a crust to eat; But a fountain of light is springing

Up from the narrow street, And whether he sings in sorrow. Or whether he sings in glee, He hopes that the world to prorrow Will list to his melody.

And I think though his heart were burning With words no mane'er said. If to morrow he were dead

Only, both late and early, The girl, as maklens will, Dreams when the voice comes clearly

Up to her window-sill. A brave face bath she found him, A manner frank and gay,

And long ago has crowned him With myrtle wreath or bay. A good sword clanging loudly, A plume on waving hair, A cloak that drapes him proudly,

Such as the players wear. So whether in glee or mainess He sings, he has won the prize,

When he brings the light of gladness To a dying maiden's eyes.
